SYNOPSIS:

Between 1975 and 1989, the most important contemporary artistic movement of underground and independent culture in the world developed in Poland. In 1981, Polish artists during martial law signed a document stating that they would not perform or participate in shows or expositions in spaces belonging to the State (television, galleries, newspapers and so on), because the State was an enemy.

It was the beginning of the most powerful independent artistic movement in the contemporary world: artists started to perform only in private flats and churches (it was a time when the church supported artists), books were printed illegally and distributed on a massive scale by hand, actors refused to perform on public television and in the general climate of fear, artists showed up to perform on the streets, creating massive movements (such as the "Orange Alternative"), their goal to be arrested en masse (the prisons had not enough space and it was causing the government a big problem). Even the secret police agents were so fascinated by this artistic world, that they left the best documentation about art life in the secret archives, documentation found by the author of the documentary. Nobody believed that the Soviet dictatorship was going to fall down.

This cultural movement was independent from the syndicate "Solidarność", even though intellectuals and artists were sympathizers. For example, the renowned artist Joseph Beuys donated about 1000 drawings and art pieces to the Museum in Lodz in 1981, to demonstrate his solidarity to Poland. Many artists came from all over the world to fraternize with Polish artists ("Konstruktja w Procesie").

Through performances, visions, archive material and individual stories of some artists; we create a peculiar fresco of those times which changed Europe under the slogan of "Solidarity". We come back from the past to the contemporary world, through a space-time journey and we involve some of those artists to participate on a new issue: Consumerism has replaced Communism, how did the idea of freedom and solidarity change its meaning? We start from Poland and my personal story: an Italian girl from Milan, an 18-year-old "communist" girl, who got a scholarship from the Academy of Fine Arts in Krakow in 1987/89 and had to cope with real Communism in Poland: the queues in shops, the lack of grocery products, no access to media and an incredible hidden and clandestine world of art and culture, which she discovers. Now a general amnesia about the past seems to dominate contemporary world.

DIRECTOR'S NOTE:

I wanted to tell the relationship between art and freedom, through a personal and at the same time very universal story that changed the entire world in 1989. A story never told. I had the honor to meet and interview the Nobel Peace Prize Lech Wałęsa, Krystina Janda and Olgierd Łukaszewicz and many other extraordinary artists protagonists of this collective story.
